The term environment as here used includes all the factors of any locality which might tend to influence the growth of the plants, as, for instance, climatic conditions, soil, time of planting and harvesting, method of cultivation and manuring, previous crop and rotation, thickness of seeding, etc. By climatic conditions rain, sunshine, humidity of the atmosphere, temperature, winds, elevation, etc., are meant. The experiments here recorded were begun in 1905 with the collaboration of the Office of Grain Investigations of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and consisted in growing wheat from the same original seed continuously in each of the three spines of a triangle, for example, (1) in Kansas, Texas, and California, (2) in South Dakota, Kansas and California. The crop from each apex was then sent to the other two stations and there grown under the same conditions as the continuously grown seed. There were thus three plots at each apex, or station, all from the same original seed; one plot grown continuously at that point, the seed of the other two plots coming from the other points of the triangle. By this interchange of seed it was possible to determine the influence of climate and soil and of the kind of seed on the composition of the crop. Previous Environment Experiments. Experiments to test the influence of environment on the composition of...
